Wesley Bernardini is Associate Professor and Chair in the Department of Sociology and Anthropology at the University of Redlands. His work focuses on issues of identity and migration in the American Southwest, specifically the consolidation of pre-contact Native American populations into the “tribal” groups recognized at the time of European contact. His close collaboration with the Hopi Tribe has led him to explore ways to productively combine the historical and spatial content of oral traditions with archaeological and geographic data in historical reconstructions. Bernardini uses GIS to model how population movements changed relationships between people and their environments, especially visual connections to landmarks.